Title and Abstract of the Doctoral Thesis (within 150 words)
Socio– Economic Aspects of the East Ghor Canal Project, Jordan The Jordan Valley has been characterized by irrigated farming for many years but the East Ghor Canal Project represents the first stage of the most recent development. This study examines some of the changes which have occurred in the project since its initiation over two decades ago. The socio–economic changes are seen partly through the continuing adjustment of cropping patterns which are analyzed at both block and farm level. These are the results of several influences including a greater and more reliable supply of water, new crop marketing opportunities, a reformed land tenure system a developing infrastructure of farm co–operatives, a farmers’ association and extension services to provide supplies, credits and other assistant to farmers. This study uses a sample of over 350 farmers in the project to establish their general characteristics and to statistically test farmer–farm relationships in attempt to better understand farmer behavior, particularly with regard to their use of elements of the evolving infrastructure. Several spatial variations are found in the socio– economic characteristics of farmers and their farming behavior. Some of these show that farmers in the earlier developed northern blocks of the project, with its better environment for irrigated farming, tend to behave differently from those of the more recently, poorer and more arid in the south. Many of these spatial variations are, however, complex and not easily explained. The study ends with a nine–fold grouping of the sampled farmers based on a wide range of socio–economic variables.
